It comes as Trinny revealed that she finds it 'upsetting' when people assume her multi-millionaire boyfriend Charles Saatchi funds her beauty business Trinny London.

Speaking in a candid new interview, the fashion and makeover expert, told how she 'shed blood sweat and tears' into her brand during a 'difficult time in her life'.

She also told in a separate honest chat how she had to sell her house and clothes to get the initial investment money to start up her now successful company and have her comeback after running into financial difficulties.

The presenter told The Times of her hard work: 'People still assume Trinny London is funded by my boyfriend. The reality is that I have shed blood, sweat and tears on it during a very difficult time in my life.

'It used to upset me. You don't want anybody to make assumptions you know are incorrect. I used to fight them really hard. Now I think: that is your s**t, not mine.'

Trinny and Saatchi - who is worth around £170million - have been dating since 2013, following the businessman's divorce from celebrity chef Nigella Lawson.

Trinny launched Trinny London - a beauty and skincare brand in 2017 - though not without its difficulties.

After running into financial trouble following the death of her ex husband Johnny Elichaoff while trying to start the business, she raised £60,000 by selling off items from her own wardrobe and eventually her own house.

She told The Telegraph: 'I was not earning the money I had been. I couldn't afford to live in the house I was living in, so I rented it out, and sold quite a few of my clothes.

'I then did a small raise, which I used for product development. When that ran out, I sold some more clothes, then sold my house, because I couldn't afford the mortgage.

'It did take balls – it was very scary. But I knew I had no alternative. Nobody becomes a great entrepreneur from a place of comfort.'
